Expanding the Discourse on Christianity in the History of Art

JAMES ROMAINE

The substance, terms, and tone of the art historical discourse are established by the methodologies that scholars employ. These methods shape how and what art history is written and taught. This is true both broadly across the academic field as well as when specifically addressing the history of Christianity and the visual arts. ReVisioning: Critical Methods of Seeing Christianity in the History of Art explores some of the underlying methodological assumptions in the field of art history by examining the suitability and success, as well as the incompatibility and failure, of varying art historical methodologies when applied to works of art that distinctly manifest Christian narratives, themes, motifs, and symbols.

In developing this project, the co-editors looked to several precedents in which the field of art history has engaged in a critical self-examination. One model for this book is Feminism and Art History: Questioning the Litany, edited by Norma Broude and Mary D. Garrard. In their introduction to that collection of essays, Broude and Garrard rightly argued that certain methodological assumptions of art history, intentionally and unintentionally, excluded women from the canon. In addressing this problem, Broude and Garrard began by noting, “The history of art, like other scholarly disciplines, has matured over the centuries by expanding its boundaries to include new ways of looking at its subject.” Following that model, this book and the Association of Scholars of Christianity in the History of Art (ASCHA), the organization that initiated this project, are here contributing to further expanding the dialog and the maturation of the discipline of art history by calling to its attention certain methodological attitudes and assumptions that limit the scholarly study of the history of Christianity and the visual arts.

Broude and Garrard’s introduction articulated a two-part objective, both of which are applicable to ReVisioning. They wrote,

> On the most basic and, to date, most visible level, [feminism] has prompted the rediscovery and reevaluation of the achievements of women artists, both past and present. Thanks to the efforts of a growing number of scholars who are devoting their research skills to this area, we know a great deal today about the work of women artists who were almost lost to us little more than a decade ago, as the result of their exclusion from the standard histories.

ASCHA and this book aim to cultivate a community of scholars committed to the recovery of the richness and diversity of the history of Christianity and the visual arts that has been in danger of becoming neglected and invisible.

However, as Broude and Garrard observed, there was/is a larger goal to be accomplished. They wrote, “Feminism has raised other even more fundamental questions for art history as a humanistic discipline, questions that are now affecting its functioning at all levels and that may ultimately lead to its redefinition.” For Broude and Garrard, feminism was a reevaluation of the patriarchal “attitudes and assumptions” that defined both the concept of “art” and its history. Broude and Garrard’s self-consciousness of the theoretical basis of their own practice as well as their act of shining a light onto the methodological assumptions evident in the field at large were both a great contribution to art history and have served as a model for this book’s attempt to question how art history has addressed, and failed to address, the history of Christianity and the visual arts.

The prevailing narrative of art history is one that charts a movement from the sacred to the secular, progressing out of past historical periods in which works of art were produced to reveal, embrace, and glorify the

3. Ibid., 1.
4. Ibid., 2.
5. Ibid., 2.
divine and toward a modern conception of art as materialist and a more recent emphasis on social context. In fact, for many art historians this secularization of art is not only a narrative within the history of art; it has been the narrative of art history as an academic field. Some interpretations of twentieth- and twenty-first-century art not only insist on equating modernism with secularism but also describe the erasure of all mention of spiritual presence from the scholarly discourse as a triumph for the field of art history. The rise of the academic art historian in the nineteenth century and the development of critical methods of art history, such as connoisseurship, formalism, iconography, psychoanalysis, and semiotics, have been regarded, and even designed, as part of a movement away from matters of personal (and therefore presumed to be subjective) faith toward a critical and rational (and therefore presumed to be objective)

6. This is the narrative of the history of art as advanced in many of the most popular survey textbooks. See Marilyn Stokstad and Michael W. Cothren, Art History, 5th ed. (Upper Saddle River: Pearson Education, 2013); and Fred S. Kleiner, Gardner’s Art Through the Ages, 14th ed. (Boston: Wadsworth, 2013). In these textbooks, the religious content and contexts of art from historical periods before the nineteenth century are addressed; however, art with religious content and contexts in the nineteenth century or after are largely ignored. Great Themes in Art, 1st ed. (Upper Saddle River: Pearson Education, 2001), a thematic survey textbook by John Walford, treats issues of spirituality roughly equally in all periods of art history.

7. In her essay “The ‘Return’ of Religion in the Scholarship of American Art,” Sally M. Promey describes the “secularization theory of modernity” (The Art Bulletin 85:3 [2003] 581–603). She notes that, as the field of art history took form in the late-nineteenth century, it was founded on positivist theories of secularization. Promey writes, “Most succinctly, secularization theory contends that modernism necessarily leads to religion’s decline, that the secular and the religious will not coexist in the modern world.” She adds, “secularization theory became a powerful shaper of disciplines and intellectual inquiry” (ibid., 584). She also adds, later in the essay, “It is no accident that American art history has recovered the study of religion at just the time when the array of ‘post-modernisms’ calls into question aspects of the Enlightenment agenda, with its attendant secularization trajectories” (ibid., 593).

8. For example, Rosalind Krauss uses the art of Piet Mondrian to make a larger point ("Grids," October 9 [1979] 50–64). She writes, “Given the absolute rift that had opened between the sacred and the secular [in the nineteenth century], the modern artist was obviously faced with the necessity to choose between one mode of expression and the other. The curious testimony offered by the grid is that at this juncture he tried to decide for both. In the increasingly de-sacralized space of the nineteenth century, art had become the refuge for religious emotion; it became, as it has remained, a secular form of belief. Although this condition could be discussed openly in the late nineteenth century, it is something that is inadmissible in the twentieth, so that by now we find it indescribably embarrassing to mention art and spirit in the same sentence” (ibid., 54; emphasis original). For a de-sacralized treatment of twentieth-century art, see Hal Foster, Rosalind Krauss, Yve-Alain Bois, and Benjamin H. D. Buchloh, Art Since 1900: Modernism, Antimodernism, Postmodernism (New York: Thames & Hudson, 2004).
discipline. Some recent methods of art history have maintained what has been regarded as a necessary skepticism toward matters of religious faith, presuming that art history and religion, especially Christianity, do not belong together.

In Art History after Modernism, Hans Belting notes that modernism was not only an artistic practice; it was also a paradigm of art history.\(^9\) As the dominance of that paradigm has waned, the discipline of art history has been freed to explore other directions and methods of scholarship. In Has Modernism Failed and The Reenchantment of Art, Suzi Gablik voiced a disenchantment with modernism, not only with its manifestation but also with its assumptions and mechanisms.\(^10\) Gablik, in turn, urged a sacralization of art as antidote. Building on Gablik’s proposition, James Elkins and David Morgan have suggested that “enchantment” as a human way of knowing, accounts for the large numbers of the public appreciation of art that involves spiritual meaning.\(^11\)

In critiquing the secularist assumptions of those methods of art history persisting from the last century, it is advisable, however, not to go too far. In many cases, the development of these art historical methods has contributed positively to the establishment of professional practices. At the same time, these methods have created problems for the field of art history. The history of art, that is, the production of art by artists, has been, is, and is likely to continue to be, largely committed to the creative visualization of faith, spirituality, and religion. Over the last two centuries, artists, not only in Europe and the Americas but throughout the world, have continued to produce works of art with distinctly Christian subjects, forms, and purposes. At the same time, images and objects reflective of Christian content and contexts have too often been met by a field that lacks the methodological framework by which to meaningfully inform their engagement. In some cases, the very structures imposed by these methods’ secularist assumptions minimize, misconstrue, or marginalize the work of art’s Christian content. The effect is a contracting rather than expanding of the experience of looking at art. ReVisioning: Critical Methods of Seeing Christianity in the History of Art contends that scholars ignore the pervasive and influential presence of Christianity in the history of art at the risk of distorting that history. There is today an urgency to develop an open and rigorous discussion of methods by which scholars can constructively engage the history of Christianity and the visual arts, as a benefit not only to that history, but to the very integrity of the field of art history itself.

\(^10\) See Suzi Gablik, Has Modernism Failed (New York: Thames & Hudson, 1985); and Suzi Gablik, The Reenchantment of Art (New York: Thames & Hudson, 1992). While there are many definitions of modernism, Gablik’s description of it as a paradigm characterized by “mechanism, positivism, empiricism, rationalism, materialism, secularism, and scientism—the whole objectifying consciousness of the Enlightenment” will suffice here. Gablik, The Reenchantment of Art, 11. Our objective is not to discard these values and embrace their opposites but rather to open them to critique as assumptions for art historical methodologies.

The dichotomy between the history of art and the methods of art history had earlier aroused Elkins’s curiosity as demonstrated in On the Strange Place of Religion in Contemporary Art, where he noted, “It is impossible to talk sensibly about religion and at the same time address art in an informed and intelligent manner; but it is also irresponsible not to keep trying.” Elkins, together with Morgan, gives his own try in Re-Enchantment, which addresses the most “challenging subjects” in current writing on topics which “bear articulation yet are not sufficiently addressed,” including the flourishing of religion in art.

In his introduction to Re-Enchantment Morgan cites this trend, finding it noteworthy, the number of art critics, art school professors, and art historians who in the face of artwork evoking religious experience express “contempt for art that intends to do so and viewers that welcome it.” Morgan proposes:

> When art takes on spiritual meanings, it requires of the professional interpreter an expertise that far exceeds the narrower and more defensible boundaries of formalist criticism, art-world journalism, knowledge of artists and their works, and skill at making art and cultivating one’s career at it.

Morgan’s observation suggests that despite the breadth of art historical methodologies in use today, the field continues to struggle to find the interdisciplinary tools by which to practice a more robust analysis of the ways in which religious faith has informed works of art. While the discrediting of antireligious rationalism appears to have spurred renewed

12. See James Elkins, On the Strange Place of Religion in Contemporary Art (New York: Routledge, 2004). At the same time, Elkins claims, “art that sets out to convey spiritual values goes against the grain of the history of modernism,” explaining that most religious art today makes itself out to be too sentimental and thus becomes simply “bad” art by failing to exercise boundaries between art and religion (ibid., 20).

15. Ibid.

© 2014 The Lutterworth Press
interest within the academy in things spiritual, if not religious, interpretive strategies have not yet been consciously and critically developed.

The questions remain, has the discipline of art history developed sufficient methodologies by which to critically see the history of Christianity in the visual arts? Do art historians possess the methodological tools to recognize and discuss the meaningful interface with works of art bearing Christian content or reference? How will art historians responsibly write about works of art with Christian content? The field of art history stands in need of its own methodological reflection. Some, perhaps including Elkins, hold that the professional standards and methods of art history are necessarily at odds with religion. Others, the editors of this book included, wish to make the case that the field of art history, in fact, must find professional standards and methods by which to addresses the history of Christianity and the visual arts.

Thankfully, this project has already been underway, with increasing momentum, for many decades. The scholarly literature addressing the history of Christianity and the visual arts has developed to such an extent that it can no longer be justly overlooked. While this literature, reflecting the complexity and diversity of its subject is far too rich and manifold to be surveyed in any single essay, it is possible to note some of its characteristics. One of the most interesting phenomena of the evolution of this literature is how it has developed along two distinct tracks: visual theology and religious culture.

Developing out of a recognition of the strengths and limitations of formalist and iconographic methods of art history, but, at the same time, wanting to keep the work of art, as a content-permeated image or object, at the center of the scholarly focus, a content-oriented method of art history began to emerge. While this method was not exclusively concerned

16. Any list of this literature will be far from a complete accounting of the depth, diversity, and richness of the scholarly discourse concerning the history of Christianity and the visual arts. This essay is principally concerned with scholarship that fits within a category of art history. Therefore, scholarship that is mainly theological—see Jeremy S. Begbie, Voicing Creation’s Praise: Toward a Theology of the Arts (Edinburgh: T. & T. Clark, 2000); or Gesa Elsbeth Thiessen, ed., Theological Aesthetics: A Reader (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 2004)—as well as books aimed at the encouragement of contemporary artists of faith—see James Romaine, ed., Objects of Grace: Conversations on Creativity and Faith (Baltimore: Square Halo, 2002); or Ned Bustard, ed., It Was Good: Making Art to the Glory of God (Baltimore: Square Halo, 2007)—are not a part of this discussion. This essay only cites books and catalogs, in English, that are largely concerned with the history of Christianity and art. To avoid redundancy, books cited in footnotes to the text of this essay are not repeated in lists of literature.

17. Erwin Panofsky and Sir Ernst Gombrich are scholars who established some of this foundation.
with spiritual or Christian content, many scholars, such as Doug Adams,\(^{18}\) Diane Apostolos-Cappadona,\(^{19}\) John Dillenberger,\(^{20}\) Jane Dillenberger,\(^{21}\) William Dyrness,\(^{22}\) and Hans Rookmaaker,\(^{23}\) have evidenced in their work a distinct concern for the sacred.

This method of art as visual theology recognizes the work of art as a personal medium, for the artist or the viewer, of a vertically-oriented imagination. Specifically applied to the history of Christianity and the visual arts, this method regards both Christianity as well as the visual arts as establishing a vertical relationship between God and humanity. This method tends to regard the work of art as biblical exegesis. This impact is not just that the work of art, or artist, is regarded as an interpreter of the Bible but that the scholar is an interpreter of the work’s meaning as it is read from the work’s iconographic and formal construction.

In the more recent literature, there has developed a rich diversity of methodological directions,\(^{24}\) addressing works for the Early Christian and Byzantine,25 Medieval,26 Renaissance and Reformation,27 Baroque and the Centuries (New Haven: Yale University Press, 1997).

---

Rococo,\textsuperscript{28} nineteenth-century,\textsuperscript{29} twentieth-century,\textsuperscript{30} and contemporary\textsuperscript{31}

\textsuperscript{31} See Ronald Bernier, ed., \textit{Beyond Belief: Theoaesthetics or Just Old-Time Religion?}
periods as well as non-Western cultures.32

A context-oriented method of art as religious culture has developed out of methods that placed issues of class, gender, race, and/or sexual orientation as formative to the work of art’s interpretation. Keeping issues of theory and history at the center of the scholarly focus, scholars have adaptively applied these strategies to develop methods of art as religious culture that address the power and presence of the visual in religious culture and practice.33 This method acknowledges the work of (Eugene, OR: Pickwick, 2010); Richard Francis, Negotiating Rapture: The Power of Art to Transform Lives (Chicago: Museum of Contemporary Art, 1996); and Eleanor Heartney, Postmodern Heretics: Catholic Imagination in Contemporary Art (New York: Midmarch Arts, 2004).

art as operating in a public sphere of life along a horizontally-oriented axis and developing a greater consciousness of both social/personal difference and connectedness. Scholars following this methodological direction are also concerned with the question of “meaning.” However, in this case, the meaning of the work of art is not read from the object itself but rather constructed from its social and cultural function.

The discipline of art history itself benefits from a balance of art- and history-oriented methods. The scholarly study of the history of Christianity and the visual arts benefits from the further development of both art-as-visual-theology and art-as-religious-culture methods. While individual scholars may be inclined in one direction or the other, it is unusual for a scholar of Christianity and the visual arts to pursue their work exclusively along either the vertical or horizontal axis. The field of scholarship needs to pursue both visual theology and religious culture.34

As the field of scholarly study of Christianity and the visual arts has grown, it has become necessary for scholars to initiate forums not only to further promote this direction of scholarship but to do so in an intentionally self-critical manner. In May 2010 a gathering of scholars convened in Paris, France for a symposium entitled “History, Continuity, and Rupture: A Symposium on Christianity and Art.”35 At this symposium, participants came to the consensus that the field of art history lacked scholarly forums in which issues of the history of Christianity in the visual arts could be openly, charitably, and critically addressed. This symposium became the inaugural event of the Association of Scholars of Christianity in the History of Art.

ASCHA is dedicated to the facilitation and promotion of scholarship that examines the complex and contradictory history of Christianity and the visual arts, as it is diversely manifested in all historical periods

---

34. In the interest of self-disclosure, it should be noted that the co-editors of this book favor differing methodological orientations. Romaine favors an emphasis on the content of the art object. Stratford favors an emphasis on theory and historical context. While every essay in this book addresses some part of the work of art’s content and context, readers can judge for themselves where each contributor’s essay fits along the vertical and horizontal axis.

35. This symposium was sponsored in part by Asbury University and its Lilly Transformations Project.
and world cultures. Second, at the conclusion of the Paris symposium, it was proposed that selected papers be gathered and published in order to continue the dialog. In February 2011, ASCHA held a symposium in New York at the Museum of Biblical Art. In 2012, ASCHA held symposia in Los Angeles at the Cathedral of Angels and in Philadelphia at the Philadelphia Museum of Art and the Pennsylvania Academy of the Fine Arts. Selected papers from ASCHA’s Paris, New York, and Philadelphia symposia are here joined by essays specifically written for this book.

ReVisioning: Critical Methods of Seeing Christianity in the History of Art, as well as the mission of the Association of Scholars of Christianity in the History of Art, aims to develop and apply methods of art history that are academically rigorous as well as responsive to the art’s Christian content. What is intended is an expanded discourse on works of art that employ religious, specifically Christian, themes, iconography, subjects, and forms through the development of a diversity of methodologies that are fitting to and effective in critiquing and interpreting this art.

Emerging out of the mission and activities of the Association of Scholars of Christianity in the History of Art, ReVisioning offers essays that examine specific works of art from the history of Christianity and the visual arts. ReVisioning opens with two introductory essays by the book’s co-editors that establish a theoretical foundation and historical context for the issues of methodology that the remaining essays address more specifically.

The development of art historical methods addressing the history of Christianity and the visual arts is best examined with reference to specific works of art from particular historical contexts. The fifteen historical essays that form this book’s main corpus have been chosen, organized, and edited to provide a chronological overview of selective examples from the history of Christianity and the visual arts with the aim of identifying specific works of art that offered interesting methodological problems. In each essay, the author has introduced a topic, reviewed the relevant critical literature, suggested methodological issues manifested by this literature’s engagement of the topic, and offered a new potential reading. These historical essays have been divided into three groups, corresponding to major periods of the history of Christianity and the visual arts: Early Christian to Medieval; Renaissance and Baroque; and nineteenth, twentieth, and twenty-first centuries.

In Likeness and Presence: A History of the Image Before the Era of Art, Hans Belting notes that prior to the Renaissance, visual imagery in the service of the Christian faith, collective liturgy, and private devotion... was not regarded as “art.” Since many methods of art history have been conceived to address European (i.e., Renaissance) conceptions of “art,” images, objects, and architectural achievements from before the Renaissance, as well as those from non-European cultures, pose particular scholarly challenges. Of concern is the fact that works of art may fail to maintain their original character as sites of religious revelation and devotion, or may fail to retain an echo of that mode of being, if sufficient methodological sensitivity is not present. ReVisioning addresses these issues with five essays that apply a range of methodologies, including iconographic, theological, contextual, semiotic, and historicizing methods, to a diversity of religious visual imagery.

As Christianity began to develop a particular visual language, artists borrowed forms, themes, motifs, and symbols from both Judaism and the Classical pre-Christian world around them. This process of visual evolution and transformation has led to issues of iconographic controversy in which the interpretation of figures and symbols depends on context and repetition. In “Iconographic Structure: Recognizing the Resurrected Jesus on the Vatican Jonah Sarcophagus,” Linda Møskeland Fuchs critically investigates the issues latent in the iconographic identification and interpretation of a central group of figures in one of the most celebrated Christian sarcophagi of the third century. Fuchs combines a careful reading of the figures’ poses and arrangement in the context of the overall composition of the sarcophagus design, comparable examples from other early Christian funerary art, biblical text, and contemporary theological writings to construct a compelling proposition that the Vatican Jonah sarcophagus features what may be the earliest known depiction of the resurrected Jesus. Her essay demonstrates how scholarship in the history of Christianity and the visual arts should begin with a study of the art objects themselves and attempt to situate those works within their artistic, cultural, and theological contexts.

In the history of Christianity and the visual arts, works have been, and continue to be, at once visual and religious experiences. In fact, the capacity of works of art to be both aesthetic and theological objects is one of the principal reasons that these works of art persist in their effect on the viewer. “Icon as Theology: The Byzantine Virgin of Predestination,” by Matthew Milliner, employs one of the most celebrated works of Byzantine art in the United States, the so-called Princeton Madonna, as a case study in how a visual image performs theologically. After briefly surveying a history of methodological issues evident in Byzantine studies, his essay critically examines the problems for the art historian in simultaneously critiquing the icon as an art object and appreciating it as theological credo.

Rachel Hostetter Smith’s “Marginalia or Eschatological Iconography?: Providence and Plenitude in the Imagery of Abundance at Orvieto Cathedral” examines the use of flora and fauna imagery as symbols of prosperity. Initially employed in Roman art, these symbols were converted to Christian use as signs of God’s providence. This essay specifically explores the connections between imagery, considered to be marginal and merely decorative, in the art and architecture of Orvieto Cathedral and the celebration of the Feast of the Palombella and Pentecost.

As the relationship between the visual arts and the Christian church evolved in Europe, images were frequently employed as texts for the illiterate. This understanding of imagery is evidenced in Medieval images of the Arma Christi, with their isolated objects floating within undefined image fields, disembodied grimacing heads, and strangely decontextualized forms. While such images may appear strange to the twenty-first-century viewer, to the medieval worshiper they were recognized as signs of Christ's passion and the salvation that his death offered. In “Iconography of Sign: A Semiotic Reading of the Arma Christi,” Heather Madar examines a c. 1460 German print of the Mass of St. Gregory. This essay probes the relationship between seeing and believing, dating back to Pope Gregory’s vision in the eighth century, that fundamentally shaped the character of Christian art. Employing semiotic theory, this essay suggests that the Arma Christi functioned primarily as signs and that it is precisely their nature as signs that explains the visual characteristics and the fundamental interpretative flexibility of these images.

The interpretative elasticity of Christian symbols allowed by the fluid play of signs within the Arma Christi is further demonstrated in its adaptation in new cultural contexts, such as sixteenth-century Mexico. In “Hybridizing Iconography: The Miraculous Mass of St. Gregory Featherwork from the Colegio de San José de los Naturales in Mexico City,” Elena FitzPatrick Sifford examines a featherwork mosaic of the Miraculous Mass of St. Gregory created by an indigenous artist for Pope Paul III. This grafting of an artistic practice of featherworking that predated the arrival of Europeans with a composition drawn from a fifteenth-century German engraving presents particular methodological issues for scholars. This essay looks at the meanings pertinent to the indigenous population in the wake of the European conquest and subsequent Christianization of the Americas.
European art of the Renaissance and Baroque periods is considered by many scholars to be the zenith of the history of Christianity and the visual arts. Despite voluminous scholarship in these areas, many unaddressed issues regarding the interchange between art and Christianity persist. ReVisioning includes five essays that discuss work from the Early Renaissance in Italy, the Northern Renaissance, the High Renaissance in Italy, the Reformation in Germany, and the Counter-Reformation in Spain in order to examine how shifting conceptions of art and changing theological contexts affected the relationship between Christianity and the visual arts.

The issue of transmission of religious meaning and experience from artist to viewer contributed, in fifteenth-century Italy, to the development of artistic strategies of visually representing three-dimensional space in two-dimensional images. In “Reading Hermeneutic Space: Pictorial and Spiritual Transformation in the Brancacci Chapel,” Chloë Reddaway examines the development of pictorial space as theological experience. She argues that the use of pictorial space by Masolino da Panicale (c. 1383–c. 1447), Masaccio (1401–1428), and Filippino Lippi (c. 1457–1504), in which the viewer is absorbed into and compositionally completes the sacred scenes, establishes a transformative relationship between the realm of divine activity evidenced in the image and the liturgical space of the chapel. This essay develops a method of critical-devotional reading, which takes seriously the nature of religious art as sacramental, revelatory, and inspirational, within a critical assessment of work’s historical and contemporary contexts.

The capability of various methodologies to critically examine works of visual art as devotional devices is further explored in Matthew Sweet Vanderpoel’s “Reading Theological Place: Joachim Patinir’s Saint Jerome in the Desert as Devotional Pilgrimage.” Treating Saint Jerome in the Desert (c. 1520) by Joachim Patinir (c. 1480–1524) as a devotional text, this essay investigates the mystical theology underpinning Patinir’s visual language of pilgrimage and landscape. Patinir’s iconography suggests that rather than discarding religious symbolism, the artist turned to a mystical theology of Christian Neoplatonism. The pilgrimage of life was depicted in numerous texts and images that indicated that the life of the Christian should be considered as a form of meditative, religious pilgrimage. Through a consideration of this medieval tradition, both in systematic texts such as Hugh of St. Victor’s Didascalicon and specific devotional works of Low Countries and Rhineland mysticism, Saint Jerome in the Desert can be seen as in harmony with a variety of lay piety movements that were spreading concomitantly with Patinir’s activity.

In “Reading Theological Context: A Marian Interpretation of Michelangelo’s Roman Pietà,” Elizabeth Lev explores one of the most famous works in the history of art by situating it in the context of Michelangelo Buonarroti’s (1475–1564) youth in distinctively Marian Florence. Michelangelo’s 1500 Pietà adapts a motif popular in Northern Europe, where emphasis was often placed on the tortured body of the dead Christ, by refocusing the viewer/worshiper’s attention toward the serene beauty of Mary, as a perfect image of both the Christian and the Roman Church.

A devotional work of an entirely different type is found in Lucas Cranach the Elder’s Passional Christi und Antichristi. A Lutheran antipapist pamphlet of 1521, this work combines prayer and propaganda in the development of a Protestant aesthetic. In her essay, “Reading Visual Rhetoric: Strategies of Piety and Propaganda in Lucas Cranach the Elder’s Passional Christi und Antichristi,” Bobbi Dykema employs a method informed by iconography, semiotics, and hermeneutics to argue that the Passional employs such strategies as binary opposition, sequencing, spatial treatment, and a complex interplay of text and image to persuade the reader-viewer of the rightness of the Lutheran cause, both affirmatively in the sense of the true religion of Christ and negatively in the sense of the pamphlet’s antipapal message.

Like many essays in ReVisioning, “Reading Devotion: Counter-Reformation Iconography and Meaning in Gregorio Fernandez’s Cristo yacente of El Pardo,” by Ilenia Colón Mendoza, examines how the history of Christianity and the visual arts is both connected across centuries of tradition and also continually reinterpreting that tradition. In seventeenth-century Spain, the medieval influenced Cristo yacente, or supine Christ, became increasingly popular as devotional aids and vehicles for spiritual contemplation. The Valladolid sculptor Gregorio Fernández was among the most accomplished sculptors of this type. Within Counter-Reformation Spain, these highly realistic polychrome wooden sculptures played a key role in the liturgical ceremony as they were understood not only as metaphors for the Eucharist but also as embodiments of the promise of resurrection.

Although the secularizing intellectual, social, and political movements of late-eighteenth and early-nineteenth-century Europe and the United States did not signify an end to the history of Christianity and the visual arts, artists did increasingly look outside of the institution of the church for patronage and inspiration. Artists continued to address Christian themes and motifs from personal motivations and with individual interpretations that were sometimes beyond the boundaries of traditional Christian doctrines. Works of art with distinctly Christian subjects and themes created within a secular context offer particular methodological challenges and opportunities. ReVisioning includes six essays addressing distinct contexts and issues from the nineteenth century to the present.

In “Historicism and Scenes of ‘The Passion’ in Nineteenth-Century French Romantic Painting,” Joyce Carol Polistena examines the cultural and religious context in mid-nineteenth-century France, which fostered a pronounced revival of Christianity. Examining The Pietà (1844) by Eugène Delacroix (1798–1863) and Christ in Gethsemane (1855) by Paul Delaroche (1797–1856), this essay explores ways in which aspects of Christ's humanity and divinity were represented in a historical context of contention between faith and agnosticism.

Throughout its history, the visual culture of the United States has reflected that nation's dual occupation with religion and commerce. Kristin Schwain's “Consuming Christ: Henry Ossawa Tanner’s Biblical Paintings and Nineteenth-Century American Commerce” examines the exhibition of works by Tanner, including Behold! The Bridegroom Cometh (1908) and Christ and His Mother Studying the Scriptures (Christ Learning to Read) (1910), in the Furniture Gallery at John Wanamaker's Philadelphia department store. This showing of large overtly religious paintings alongside mass-produced commodities poses challenges to scholarly methods in that the intermingling of fine art, commercial culture, Christian belief, and modern life, which was characteristic of many aspects of nineteenth-century American culture, does not fit the urge, by both religious conservatives and secular progressives, for defining and separating categories of “spiritual” and “materialist.”

Engaging modernist art, as artists increasingly turned from the narratives and beliefs of the church to personal interpretations of the spiritual, scholars have, at times, needed to develop biographical, yet critical, methods of examining the artist's own, sometimes private, motivations. “Figuring Redemption: Christianity and Modernity in Max Beckmann's Resurrections,” by Amy K. Hamlin, examines the process of creation and reception of two depictions of the resurrection by one of the most celebrated German artists of the twentieth century. These two works, the first completed in 1909 and the second begun in 1916 but left unfinished at the artist's death in 1950, demonstrate Beckmann's obsessive struggle to produce works that were at once religious and modernist. Rather than regarding Beckmann’s efforts as a failure, this essay considers these history paintings of religious subjects not only as an attempt to escape from the chaos and pain of modern reality, such as war and fascism, but also as visualization of creative redemption.

The methodological challenges of addressing religious art within a modernist context become accentuated when the artist himself, such as in the case of Francis Bacon, openly professes his atheism. In “Embodiment as Sacrament: Francis Bacon’s Postwar Horror,” Rina Arya examines how Bacon articulated his doubts in visual terms employing distinctly Christian subjects, such as the crucifixion and the Pope. In a post-Christian context of the “death of God,” Bacon reinforced the sacramental in a meeting between the sacred and the profane, where the body mediates as a threshold between life and death. By reinterpreting conventional motifs in a contemporary idiom, Bacon reinvigorated the fundamental urgency of Christian iconography.

Paul Pfeiffer is a contemporary artist who operates, in part, within the conceptual space of contemporary sacred art opened up by Francis Bacon. Pfeiffer’s art, in digitally manipulated photography and video, aligns diverse secular subjects, such as professional athletes and game show contestants, with explicitly religious themes. Focusing on one particular work, “Media, Mimesis, and Sacrifice: Paul Pfeiffer’s Contemporary Christological Lens,” by Isabelle Loring Wallace traces the artist’s development of the sacrificial figure in contemporary culture. Rather than choosing between a secular or religiously informed reading, this essay attempts to bring these concerns together in an effort to answer the ultimate question begged by Pfeiffer’s work: “What is the relevance of Judeo-Christian thematics to contemporary art and life?”

As part of the Art for Faith’s Sake series, ReVisioning affirms and critically examines the rich and complicated relationship of the church and the visual arts. This history testifies to the fact that “the creation of resources for the church at worship” is a far more complex task than might be initially supposed.36 As Marcia Hall notes in her book The Sacred Image in the Age of Art, “The sacred image is a genre that serves two masters, art and the Church.”37 While Hall carefully examines the tensions between the artist’s creative impulse and the demands of religious purpose, ReVi-sioning demonstrates that this relationship between art and faith, manifested in works that are equally spectacular and subtle in their marriage of profound theological content and exquisite visual form, demands careful scholarly examination from varying methodological perspectives. Essays in ReVisioning describe the enterprise of artists, many of them unnamed, overcoming theological and historical obstacles that might have prevented the establishment and initial cultivation of the dynamic and diverse tradition that is the history of Christianity and the visual arts. These essays observe how the history of Christianity and the visual arts developed, from its formative steps in the third and fourth centuries to an opulent flowering in the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries. The development of iconography, such as the Virgin of Predestination and the Arma Christi, evidence how artists succeeding in visualizing theology.

36. Art for Faith’s Sake series statement.

Having made a place for themselves within the church, though not without certain periods of controversy and iconoclasm, visual artists served, at least historically, “a higher purpose” in the context of liturgy and meditation. Artists discussed in the second section of ReVisioning, including such eminent and diverse figures as Masaccio, Patinir, Michelangelo, Cranach, and Fernandez, demonstrate that the history of art cannot be accurately written without an acknowledgement of Christianity and liturgical theology, nor can the history of “the church at worship” be written without addressing the visual arts. And yet, for several centuries, the church has largely neglected the visual arts. In fact, if the history of secularization, reviewed earlier, is regarded by some as advancement, there may be a corresponding retreat, on the part of the church, from the arena of the visual arts. The third section of ReVisioning recounts how the history of Christianity and the visual arts is now a tradition largely sustained by artists, such as Beckmann and Pfeiffer, who are not Christians. Their art, like that of Tanner, who was a Christian, not only exists outside of the church but also, in the case of Bacon’s art, even outside the realm of faith. If artists, working within the tradition of Christianity and the visual arts, have been creating “for faith’s sake” for nearly two millennia, the most recent chapters of this history present difficult challenges and contradictions.

The shared premise of ReVisioning and the Art for Faith’s Sake series is that there is no such thing as theologically-neutral art. Nor is there theologically-neutral scholarship of art. While the history of Christianity

38. Art for Faith’s Sake series statement.
39. Ibid.
and the visual arts remains vigorous, there is still more work to be done by scholars in the fields of art history and theology to bring this history to light.

The essays collected in ReVisioning: Critical Methods of Seeing Christianity in the History of Art demonstrate the rich breadth and diversity of visual materializations of Christian beliefs, practices, debates, narratives, themes, motifs, and symbols in art. Individually, these essays represent a series of specific propositions in revising the methodological assumptions brought to a particular work of art. In many cases, this means attempting to recover an experience of the work of art as it was meant to be experienced. However, in looking back to history, these essays also address the present and the future. Collectively, these essays represent a call to the field of art history to set aside previously held secularist prejudices and engage in a more open, generous, liberal, and critical scholarly dialog.

As positive models, the essays in this book suggest how the critical and scholarly study of the history of Christianity and the visual arts benefits from a careful consideration of the methodologies with which scholarly work is conducted. These essays represent a diversity of potential responses to the complex problem of addressing art with distinctly Christian themes and motifs in academically rigorous methods. They do not represent a conclusive list of possible approaches. The readers may find each of these methods to be more or less successful. Nevertheless, these essays represent both a challenge to the field of art history and a foundation for further work exploring the scholarly discourse concerning the history of Christianity and the visual arts.

Recent scholarship in the field of art history points to growing interest in the complex and sometimes contradictory history of Christianity and the visual arts. In Reluctant Partners: Art and Religion in Dialogue, Ena Giurescu Heller, former executive director of the Museum of Biblical Art, traces some of this development. What is evident from Heller’s text is that, since the latter decades of the twentieth century, serious art historical work has begun to rediscover ways in which works of art function as sites of sacred encounter. Recognizing and cultivating conversations about Christian content, art historians are exercising a variety of interpretive frameworks assuring that religious imagery will not be overlooked. Referencing an apparent conversation concerning the title of her 2004 book, Heller notes “[Doug] Adams, who is one of the pioneers of the field, is so encouraged by recent developments as to suggest that the partnership between art and religion has advanced from a ‘reluctant’ to an ‘expectant’ stage.” 40 We believe that many of these expectations of a development of methods of art history that critically, intentionally, and strategically engage the history of Christianity and the visual arts are, in part, already being realized.